

Pay equity promising, but Budget 2018 still falls far short for too many working Canadians ^[1]

Author: Canadian Union of Public Employees

Source: Canadian Union of Public Employees

Format: Article

Publication Date: 26 Feb 2018

AVAILABILITY

Full PDF online ^[2]

EXCERPTS

After calling on the federal government to take action for years, CUPE is pleased to finally see a commitment on pay equity in Budget 2018, but stresses the need for more action from the federal government to support working women across the board.

“Canadian women have waited long enough for pay equity,” said CUPE National President Mark Hancock, also noting other positive measures in the Budget like enhanced parental leave and the use of a gender equality lens. “If the prime minister is serious about this commitment, we hope he’ll be encouraging the remaining provinces to follow suit with their own legislation so that women working in all sectors of the economy don’t have to wait any longer.”

CUPE is dismayed at the federal government’s continued failure in Budget 2018 to pursue tax fairness despite repeated calls from experts and civil society organizations who had been calling on the government to crack down on tax havens, close CEO stock option loopholes, and require international digital corporations like Uber and Facebook to collect and remit sales tax like any other business.

“The prime minister can call himself a supporter of middle class and working Canadians, or he can keep letting CEOs and corporate giants off the hook for their fair share in taxes,” said CUPE National Secretary-Treasurer Charles Fleury. “But he can’t have it both ways.”

CUPE is also astonished to discover that the government will lose $2.1 billion in revenues over four years from tariffs foregone as a result of signing the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

For years, CUPE has been calling on the government to establish a universal pharmacare program to assist the millions of Canadians who don’t have prescription drug coverage, and too often have to choose between paying for rent and groceries or refilling their prescriptions.

“After studies by the Parliamentary Budget Officer, the Standing Committee on Health, and a motion in Parliament to implement pharmacare which the Trudeau government voted against in October 2017, CUPE believes the time for more study on pharmacare is past. It’s time for the federal government to make a real political and financial commitment to making pharmacare a reality,” said Hancock.

CUPE is pleased to see enhanced support for second parent leave in Budget 2018. However, for a budget supposedly focused on increasing gender equality, it is outrageous that the government continues to avoid taking meaningful action to support parents with the skyrocketing cost of child care.

CUPE is Canada’s largest labour union, representing 650,000 workers in every province across sectors.

-reprinted from Canadian Union of Public Employees

Related link:

Region: Canada ^[3]

Tags: budget ^[4]

gender ^[5]

equality ^[6]

government ^[7]

parental leave ^[8]

workforce ^[9]

Source URL (modified on 27 Jan 2022): <https://childcarecanada.org/documents/child-care-news/18/02/pay-equity-promising-budget-2018-still-falls-far-short-too-many>

Links

^[1] <https://childcarecanada.org/documents/child-care-news/18/02/pay-equity-promising-budget-2018-still-falls-far-short-too-many> ^[2] <https://cupe.ca/pay->

equity-promising-budget-2018-still-falls-far-short-too-many-working-canadians [3] <https://childcarecanada.org/taxonomy/term/7864> [4]
<https://childcarecanada.org/category/tags/budget> [5] <https://childcarecanada.org/category/tags/gender> [6]
<https://childcarecanada.org/category/tags/equality> [7] <https://childcarecanada.org/taxonomy/term/8941> [8]
<https://childcarecanada.org/category/tags/parental-leave> [9] <https://childcarecanada.org/category/tags/workforce>