Excerpts

After parent fees were cut in half at the end of 2022, the Toronto mother and her partner had an extra $1,000 each month. The savings were a major factor in their decision to buy a house that spring.

Two years later, Bruno's situation has been upended. In November, her son's daycare told parents it was pulling out of the national program and fees would be increasing 150 per cent in the new year.

The main cause of the lower rates in Toronto and its surrounding cities are the number of for-profit daycare operators choosing not to participate.

Twenty-five per cent of for-profit daycares in the GTA have opted-out of the national program, according to data collected by the Star. By comparison, just 6 per cent of non-profits have opted out.
