

Should employers accommodate shift workers with child care needs? ^[1]

Author: The Current with Anna Maria Tremonti

Source: CBC radio

Publication Date: 11 Mar 2013

AVAILABILITY

Listen online [starts at 2:10] ^[2]

Description:

Fiona Johnstone was a new mother who wanted to and exchange her shift rotation for static hours. When her request was denied, Johnstone fought back. Her legal battle has resulted in a decision that could have far-ranging implications for workers trying to juggle job demands with familial responsibilities.

Related link:

Canadian Border Services Agency discriminated against employee when it refused to accommodate employee's child-care request, court rules ^[3]

Region: Canada ^[4]

Source URL (modified on 27 Jan 2022): <https://childcarecanada.org/documents/research-policy-practice/13/03/should-employers-accommodate-shift-workers-child-care-needs>

Links

[1] <https://childcarecanada.org/documents/research-policy-practice/13/03/should-employers-accommodate-shift-workers-child-care-needs> ^[2]

<https://www.cbc.ca/thecurrent/episode/2013/03/11/should-employers-accommodate-shift-workers-with-childcare-needs/> ^[3]

<http://childcarecanada.org/documents/child-care-news/13/02/canadian-border-services-agency-discriminated-against-employee-when-> ^[4]

<https://childcarecanada.org/taxonomy/term/7864>